The Australian government continues its atrocious policies and treatment of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. Incarceration rates have skyrocketed and removal of children continues at horrifying levels. People are being pushed from their homelands and hard won land rights are being negated by imposition of 99-year leases. This is one of the most shameful times in the history of Australia's brutal and racist treatment of Aboriginal people and has set the struggle for Aboriginal Rights back many decades.

John Pilger's landmark film Utopia shows how destructive policies by both Liberal and Labor governments have been, and continue to be. The living standards of Aboriginal people, from the outback to the city, have not improved under the Intervention/Stronger Futures, yet both major parties unequivocally support this legislation. Punitive, controlling policies have continued since the invasion in 1788 and must stop. Aboriginal people have fought for an end to the NT Intervention, demanding community control, self determination and direct investment in housing and employment. First Nation people across the country have continually pleaded with governments to work with them – not against them.

Income management has been a disaster - but the government plans to broaden this costly system to include 'vulnerable' groups in areas across Australia, including homeless youth and people recently released from prison.

The fightback from Aboriginal people in the NT and groups like STICS across the country have been crucial for building awareness and opposition. Since the announcement of the expansion of Income Management to Bankstown in Sydney, child protection workers in the Public Service Association (PSA) have voted to put a ban on referring people to the system and many organisations including the NSW ALP, have condemned the measures. With new attacks from the Abbott government, including attempts to break up Aboriginal land councils, devastating cuts to Aboriginal legal aid and even more punitive measures around alcohol and welfare, the campaign needs your support more than ever!
